1. SAÂDANE AFIF, PRIZE WINNER OF PRIX MARCEL DUCHAMP 2009

«Saâdane Afif’s work is simultaneously incredibly simple and extraordinary complex, at once familiar and strange. Despite operating within recognizable framework of contemporary French sculpture, he stands outside the usual networks of French contemporary art with a career and outlook that is increasingly international.

Afif’s sculptures and installations exhibit a melancholic yet festive beauty. They delight in their own materiality and frequently incorporate light, sound and movement, seducing the audience with a compact spectacle of son et lumière. His works demonstrate a whimsical poetry and robust sense of mortality: ghosts appear with regularity and there are repeated references to the passing of time and the inevitability of death, most clearly manifested in the recurrent motifs of the skull and the ticking clock. A fascination with music and music culture is also discernible, in works featuring microphones, amplifiers, and musical instruments. Many also include music as an active ingredient, particularly in the form of play-lists or as outcome of an abstract translation of ideas.

Since 2004, music has also influenced the creation and presentation of Afif’s work. At that time, he began inviting writers to create lyrics inspired by his works, a process of artistic delegation that he continues to expand today. The lyrics are co-signed by the songwriter and the artist and have been included in several of Afif’s exhibitions – usually as wall-mounted vinyl lettering – replacing institutions’ didactic labels. Afif gives the lyrics to musicians, with the commission to set them to music. The resulting songs have been presented in exhibitions as both live and recorded elements, released on CD on the artist’s own semiafif label, and broadcast in shows devised by Afif on FM radio in Berlin, Rotterdam and Bremen. Appropriation, infiltration and piracy are key concepts in Afif’s practice, all embodied by the medium of radio: the invisible waves on which his ideas travel permeate not only his exhibition spaces, but also the private spaces of local inhabitants as they go about their daily lives.

Afif describes himself as a particle accelerator, provoking the imagination of others. [...] »

Extract from the text of Zoë Gray, curator at the Witte de With at Rotterdam and reporter for Saâdane Afif as part of the 2009 edition of the Marcel Duchamp Prize, published in Le Prix Marcel Duchamp. 2009, éditions Un. Deux... Quatre.
2. INTRODUCTION OF THE EXHIBITION

Here in Espace 315 Saâdane Afif presents a large, two-metre-long coffin in the form of the Centre Pompidou. On the basis of a very precise brief about the project, he has commissioned song lyrics from more than a dozen writers of his acquaintance, now displayed on the walls of the exhibition space. He also commissioned the aluminium cylinders – cast from a mould of one of the stone bollards surrounding the Piazza outside the Centre – on which, on the day of the opening, an actor will stand to declaim the words. This format – the production of objects combined with the commissioning of texts to detailed guidelines – has now become typical of an artist who describes himself as a « wordy conceptualist. » Behind the project is a desire to absorb and express a sense of the place, but the work also embodies a sprawling network of stories connected with the artist’s encounters in the making of it, for which it acts as a receptacle. To get others to write about and around his work is to bring it new forms and to prompt reflection on the notions of metamorphosis and shifting point of view. « It’s a method that allows the constant generation of mutations within the work, the mutation of forms. They mutate, rather than being transformed. My work can cite itself and it doesn’t get desiccated, because there’s always the input of others. »

Elaboration of meaning

All Saâdane Afif’s pieces work with multiple layers of meaning. They are anchored in a place, here the Centre Pompidou, around which revolve the artist’s own history and the histories of the Centre and of the people he has encountered in the context of the project, intersecting and interpenetrating, each adding a layer of meaning. Afif emphasizes the fact that it was at the Centre Pompidou he discovered art, visiting as a teenager. « When I was twelve. I lived in Blois. I used to go to my aunt’s in Ménilmontant to get away from the boredom of a provincial town. I learned to take the Métro all by myself, getting off the Ménilmontant line at Rambuteau. By then, the Piano and Rogers building was fully operational and it was very accessible. » The meeting place that is the Centre’s Forum is for him the locus of all possibilities, the place of intersection of all the currents. But why a coffin? « There are obviously a lot of possibilities. A coffin for the artist, for the artist’s work. And it reflects too the ideas of the avant-gardes about the death of art, the death of beauty, the death of painting and then the death of the artist: the museum as necropolis. It could be a Vanitas, which is a recurrent theme in my work. » This reference to the tradition of the Vanitas is an important aspect of all his projects. Behind the theme are many centuries of the history of art, here strikingly transformed into an object. Nonetheless, the artist rejects anything definite, anything that might resemble a fixed and finished form. The title of the exhibition indeed evokes many other narratives and references. « An Anthology of Black Humour »: taken from the title of an anthology by André Breton, it makes direct reference to Dada and Surrealism, while the exhibition has been organized in the context of the Marcel Duchamp Prize. The artist decided to baptize his coffin « Black Humour », and so the texts he commissioned about it may be thought of as forming an « anthology of black humour » in another sense. He also mentions the exhibition « Les Magiciens de la terre » at the Centre Pompidou and La Villette in 1989, where Ghanaian coffins in the form of animals, vehicles etc. were shown for the first time. In presenting his coffin, Saâdane Afif re-presents this history. Indeed, he went to Ghana to have the coffin made, there meeting Kudjoe, a young artisan once the assistant to Paa Joe, who created coffins in extraordinary shapes. Adding a further layer of meaning, he mentions too the importance of African sculpture to the modernist tradition. Remembering the Centre Pompidou of his teenage years, Saâdane Afif also recalls the presence of soapbox speakers on the street. « When I was in Ghana, » he says, « I was fortunate to be invited to a funerary ceremony. There they spoke of the deceased as if he were living and told stories about him. In the end, this « soapbox » business gets its meaning from that day, very far from the Centre’s Piazza. »

The multiple elements all gravitate around the history of a single place, while taking in Ghana, surrealism and Dada. They find themselves materialised in a group of objects and retransmitted in the lyrics that elaborate upon them.
The Lyrics
« I work with writers who aren’t so much songwriters as people who can write, who enjoy writing. » These texts, which he describes as “outgrowths” of his work, contribute something extra to it, « through the imagination of others, raising one of the questions that I take to be fundamental: what responsibility do we have in bringing our attention to bear on works of art? How do we integrate them into the field of our own culture, in our own words? How does one interpret a work of art? How do we make a work our own? » In foregrounding the metaphorical relation between word and work, it is this that he invites visitor to do.

The centrality of the visitor
For Afif indeed, the visitor is a central figure. In this respect he is one of recent generation of artists to have taken the question of the viewer or visitor seriously. « I often sum up my work in the questions: Why do we make works of art? What needs do they meet? What do they do to the way I see the world? And so on. These are very straightforward questions, without a definite answer, which give me the energy to do things and the pleasure I take in that. » All these elements contribute to a work in constant movement. « I spend my time trying not to finish work. I end up showing finished moments, but they already point to something beyond. When you have a sculpture with texts that speak of all the things I’ve just discussed, there is/already a potential elsewhere, a potential future for the work. It’s the antithesis of wanting to fix and reify the work of art, which then becomes a sort of dumb idol. » For all that, the question of form is crucial for Saâdane Afif. « It’s not iconoclastic, it’s work that reflects on how one achieves form. Above all, the form of the exhibition, which is my favoured medium. Forms are important, they are the way-marks on our journeys. »

In its commitment to support contemporary art, it programs events for each of the eight Hermès exhibition spaces worldwide and produces the exhibitions held there. These galleries showcase contemporary artwork and photography. Add to that the H Box, a nomadic structure exclusively dedicated to video art. The Hermès Foundation is also a committed sponsor of many other social as well as cultural projects. It is in this spirit that it chose, as did the house of Hermès before it, to support the Marcel Duchamp Prize in the accompaniment of young artists.

Artcurial / Briest Poulain F. Tajan — www.artcurial.com
Artcurial is happy to support the Association for the International Diffusion of French Art in its promotion of French contemporary art, notably through the Marcel Duchamp Prize, intended to raise the profile of young French artists on the international scene. The leading French auction house, Artcurial Briest Poulain F.Tajan is part of the international reality of the art market and has been asserting its leadership in contemporary art sales in France for more than ten years now. However, this major actor on the market remains open and curious about new talents and doesn’t hesitate to break new ground for collectors, with for instance Street Art or contemporary art in the Middle East. Finally, the auction house is housed in the Hôtel Marcel Dassault, alongside the greatest art library in Paris, offering a richness and quality of advice that makes it one of the Adiaf collectors’ favourite establishments.
